

The end of Mark 15 (excluding verse 47), along with Mark 16:1 in Codex Sinaiticus (c. 350 AD)

What is the true ending of Mark?

The ending of Mark is controversial with some groups. There are several different endings to the Gospel of Mark found in the various Greek manuscripts. Most Greek texts and several ancient translations conclude with the ending familiar to us as Mark 16:9-20. However, the earliest Greek manuscript with that ending is from the fifth century, although evidence from the church fathers suggests that the longer ending was already in existence during the second century. Many scholars feel, however, that, in addition the manuscript evidence, the vocabulary and themes of the traditional ending are inconsistent with the rest of the Gospel.

In the two oldest Greek manuscripts, the Sinaitic and the Vatican 1209, and in a number of ancient versions, Mark's Gospel ends at Mark 16:8. Clement of Alexandria and Origen show no knowledge of any ending of this Gospel account beyond Mark 16:8, and Eusebius and Jerome affirm that nearly all Greek manuscripts known to them were concluded with Mark 16:8. Most scholars believe that this is indeed the point at which the original Gospel probably ended and suggest that the other endings very likely developed during the second century, after the Gospel of Mark was read alongside the other Gospels and appeared, by comparison, to lack a satisfactory conclusion.

Despite its abruptness, Mark 16:8 is arguably an appropriate ending for the Gospel, since one of its motifs is the fear caused by God's powerful work in and through Jesus (Mark 5:15,33; 9:6). The women's fear suggests that God had performed one more climactic, powerful work, confirming the testimony of the empty tomb and the angelic announcement that Jesus had indeed arisen from the dead just as he had promised (Mark 8:31; 9:3; 10:34).

(One source: New International Version Archaeological Study Bible)

For more information related to this subject, please see the following article on this website:

"Does the Gospel of Mark End at 16:20, or 16:8?" –

<https://bibleauthenticity.org/know-mark-ends-168-not-1620/>